The timber was mostly scrub oak and scrubby little pines, but in a dense grove of these Barclay had built a low. rambling house which was very dear to him, and wonderful rose gardens which were even dearer. In this island retreat, open and ready for the master the year round, the tri-umvirate, if only they could reach it, would be as eafe from mob violence as

A steep climb, a wild expanse of star-lit moor, little ancient trees growing very close together, a strong perfume of bayberry bushes, of sweet fern and of bayberry bushes, or sweet tern and roses, and then the low-ceilinged, softly-lighted hall, with many men servants, a cool delightful night, soundly slept— these were Celestia's first impressions these were Cel

Soon after Tommy's departure, and before the triumvirate could complete their arrangements for the retreat to Gordon Barclay's house and the streets in the neighborhood began to fill with men and women, who looked like the dregs of the city.

But it was immediately in front of the house that the crowd was thickest and most menacing. Here men made fiery, unbridled speeches and were cheered to the echo, and here the police, erect unperturbed, superb in danger, wondered in their hearts if they were going to live through the day.

There was no actual violence until Gunsdorf arrived. He, high above the crowd on an improvised rostrum, roared for blood and vengeance.

Weapons began to flash.

Then the police tried to disperse the breaking of many heads, were overpowered, passed over, and swept aside. Then the crowd began to swarm over the tail iron gates and the spiked iron fence. One man slipped, and so impaled himself that when he finally tore loose and dropped to the ground he was in a dying condition.

The financiers and love-making swerve to the left, almost threw him off.

Shots were fired. The car went over something soft that screamed and that remainined in the street at the wind passed, and thwacked like a newly landed fish.

At Missaquid, the point of departure for Bartell's, there seemed to be some sort of a rumor in the air and a state of suppressed excitement. Usually it is a town that goes to bed very early. But this was not the case tonight. There was a rough looking crowd at the station, and at the wharf.

Tommy, without arousing suspicion. could not find out if Barciay, Semmes and Sturtevant had gone on ahead or were following.

"If they are behind us," he said to Celestia, "they'll have to charter some-looked furiously angry. Semmes looked looked furiously angry. Semmes some seasick.

At the gates stood two footmen ready to fling them open. Most of the crowd was at the front of the house. In the narrow alley at the back there was only a scattering of riffraff. One of the men on the box handled a double-barraled shotgun. In Sturtevant's hand, cooked, was a 45 automatic. was a 45 automatic.

Meanwhile the bronze boy of the fountain came up the front stair, battered head first, and was used to ram down the door behind which Barclay had been seen to disappear. The first man to enter the long, rich library was Gunsdorf. He gave only a glance at the open panel which disclosed the inviting interior of a safe, or at the greenbacks and yellowbacks of all denominations which the wiley of all donominations which the wiley financier had scattered about the room, on tables, on chairs, on the floor—such things were for children. Raging for his comrades to follow him, Gunsdorf fushed the length of the room, found the back stair down which Barclay had retreated, and came in less time than it takes to tell it to the service court at the back of the house.

But nobody followed Gunsdorf. The open safe, the scattered bills, stopped men as a solid cliff might have done. Vengeance was forgotten, and done. Vengeance was forgotten, and the crowd began to loot.

When Gunsdorf reached the court-yard the gates were half open. On strong steel brackets fixed to the back of the car were two spare rims, with inflated tires. These formed a resting place for Gunsdorf's feet and a grip for his hands. But the first forward leap of the car, followed by a hair-raising swerve to the left, al-

saith the Lord."

The old fishing town of Giddings was dark as sin. The financiers, conferring, had determined to make this, rather than Missaquid, their point of departure. They would be too late to catch the last boat for Bartell's. Gidding, with Missaquid, formed the base of a trangle of which Guil Island was of a triangle, of which Gull Island was the apex. Therefore, if they could here the apex. Therefore, if they could here charter some craft to convey them to the island, there would be a great sav-
